While business development activities continued at a brisk pace, the expanded nature and scope of work in discussion resulted in lengthier sales cycles. This impacted the company's quarterly revenue in comparison to the previous fiscal period. Management does anticipate these projects coming to fruition in future periods. More specifically, there is a concerted effort to focus the company's business development strategy on larger size initiatives and further capturing value based and consultative sales opportunities. By focusing on larger projects, rather than numerous small projects, management anticipates better control and lower expenses in terms of required resources and contractors to complete work, therefore allowing for higher margins.
